Strober, a labor economist, became the first-ever woman faculty member at Stanford Graduate School of Business and led thousands of students through her popular course on family and money. One couple, coauthor Abby Davisson and her boyfriend, Ross, were at a crossroads and applied the course material to their relationship, leading to a close bond with Strober. The teacher-student pair teamed up to combine decades of teaching and application. They present a road map for life's biggest decisions, including deciding whom to marry, whether or not to have children, where to live, and more life choices through the golden years. The advice is built upon personal accounts, student surveys, in-depth interviews, and research from academic and popular literature. It also covers the 5 Cs of the decision-making framework, letting users choose which section applies to them at the time. Readers will find intriguing stories and end-of-chapter exercises to get them thinking. This book has a broad appeal and will be of interest to those looking for self-help in the areas of personal choices around love and money.
